

Should we model different user types, or should we provide all users with all functions?

If we model different user types we need to decide on user authentication.

We could chose to omit authentication. IE the user just choses a role. Or, we could simulate authentication. IE user enters a fixed "code."

Or we could implement a real authentication system.